PLANTS AND DANCE: GESTURES GREAT AND SMALL

Kellie Newsome,
Abstract oil detail

Growth, change and movement are constants. So it is in science, but it also is in art! What are the tools we use to describe such things?

In nature and in life, what does it look like to thrive? How do we share our successes in order to inspire others?

This summer, work and play with three fabulous artists who will surely help you and your students thrive in the coming year.

We will connect botany, natural systems, color, abstraction, movement, and creative expression.

Featured Artist, Nancy Murphree Davis will lead you through several small scale, easily adaptable artistic techniques that you can apply with your students while teaching either (or both) science and language arts.

Painter, Kellie Newsome will help you grow your ambitions and your classroom art to proportions you never thought possible. Her work provides the perfect link to the Johnson Center for the Arts' September exhibition of paintings by James C. Leonard.

Dancer, Mary Foshee will help you tie it all together with kinesthetic experiences to invigorate your teaching skills. Learn how to use dance and movement in your classroom to capture the hearts and minds of your students.
